to Grant. WHEN Corbin determined to change his base of operations from Washington to New York, he at once put his elegant mansion in the former city in the market for sale, but for a number of months was unable to find a purchaser at any price. Indeed, though one of the most spacious and elegant dwedlings in Washington, its location of this system, it would not be inapprowas undesirable, and at the time of its of. priate for me to say a few words in its befer Corbin was unable to dispose of it. At half. In the first place no comparison can last he approached Gen. Grant with a of the house was beyond his means, and declined to become a purchaser. Nothing daunted by this refusal, Corbin hunted up closest nature, and to him renewed the proposal. The proposition he made through Gen. Hillyer was certainly a most inviting one. He would sell the place to Gen. Grant for $30,000, and would leave the per cent., and if, at any time during the vent and review error as with us. As a the house for ten years with interest at 5 of his bargain, Corbin would agree to surthe place back. At this time Gen. Grant This has rendered property in foreign was paying $2,000 a year rent for a house, patents exceedingly precarious. Such as while this arrangement would give him a house at only $1,500 rent. Still the General hesitated. It was, he insisted, too much money for him to put into a house, At this point Corbin suggested to Hill-

ver that if Grant would buy the house the public would quickly help him pay for it, and pointed out the obligations the nation rested under to the conqueror of the rebellion, and added, "You see Grant again, and get him to take the house, and then we will go to New York and raise a fund difficulty in inducing the General to accept the proposition, it being distinctly understood that Corbin would interest himself in raising a testimonial that would enable the General promptly to pay the

When these preliminaries were arranged, it was found necessary to come to New York to execute the papers, and Gen. could be executed and exchanged. He ed time there assembled at Mr. Corbin's S. Grant, Mr. Abel R. Corbin, and Mrs. Corbin, since deceased; Mr. F. E. Mather, attorney for Mr. Corbin; Gen. W. S. Hillyer, attorney for Gen. Grant: Judge Clark, of the Supreme Court, by invitation, to take the necessary acknowledgements, and Mr. Amos R. Eno, as witness to the papers. The papers having been previously drawn and mutually examined by the attorneys of the two contracting parties, were now formally read, signed sealed, and delivered, and Gen. Grant became the owner in fee simple and absolute of the Washington mansion, and Mr. Corbin became the possessor of a mortgage upon the same for $20,000, with interest at |

Within a very few days after these occurrences a committee of prominent gentlemen of wealth assembled in a private room in Fifth Avenue hotel, on the invitation of Mrs. Amos R. Eno, to consider the propriety of making a testimonial presennation to Gen. Grant. Who composed that company, or all that was said and done at that meeting it is unnecessary now to rehearse. It will be sufficient to say that Secretary of the Treasury, that the government should reward Gen. Grant, as the British government had rewarded the Duke of Wellington, and that individuals ought not to be called upon for contributions to such a testimonial, Mr. Eno assented to that proposition on general principles, but remarked that as the governmen would not or did not take hold of the matter, it was the duty of the citizens to do it and remarked that Gen. Grant was now living in a house upon which there was a mortgage of $30,000. This hint produced a telling effect upon the large-hearted merchants and capitalists there assembled, and it was determined to raise the means at once to pay off that mortgage. The result of the movement then and there inaugurated is well known. Not only was a sufficient sum raised to pay off virtually a cash transaction, but the testimonial swelled to $100,000, with the balance of which Gen. Grant furnished his Missouri property, and had a handsome sum left, which he invested in government

Thus is seen the shrewd management of Mr. Able R. Corbin, his adroitness in keeping in the background, and the obligations under which he succeeded in placing Gen. Grant toward himself.—Eastern Paper.
